If we assume a formal system that models the natural language "somebody said that", then the following is consistent: (S (NP (N "somebody") "said" (VP (VBZ that) (NP (NNP(the) "there") "is" (PP (IN a) "a")))..)) This is easily verified by searching and looking for negations of each predicate until a contradiction is reached. The problem, is that this is not a formal system as defined by formalization. (ie: it does not follow the strict mathematical definitions of formal systems) This means that we can prove logical equivalences in such a formal system with the logical definitions but this is not good enough. It needs to be formalized and prove the logical equivalences for the formal system. So this means that the above formal system can prove the above statement. To prove that the above formal system is inconsistent. The question is : can we define a formal system that is strictly following the definition of truth that is consistent (that does not prove the above statement)? A: A consistent formal system is not one in which you can prove anything. It's the formal system in which you can prove the things that you prove when you're in the real world. So if you take some thing that you can prove about the real world, then your formal system is consistent. In particular, a formal system is consistent if you can prove that the formal system is consistent. So you can prove that, from an inconsistent system, you can prove anything. (In particular, you can prove that the system is inconsistent). Crystalline silica is a known lung carcinogen that has been shown to be present in the drinking
