Thus, the apparent lack of folding signals in antigen-antibody complexes formed by the two dimers can be explained by a relevant role of this interaction in the stabilization of the protein complex. The presence of well defined conformational epitopes and their determinant residue profiles indicate that the antigen-antibody interaction is a crucial step in the stabilization of the protein complex and it contributes to the stabilization of at least one of the protomers in the dimer. Stabilization of the interaction could be achieved by the sigmoidal response of the protomers as a consequence of their ability to change their state of interaction when becoming stable and this is in line with the effect of antibody-antigen recognition. Once stabilized, the overall structure of the dimer could be the result of the optimization of the interaction between different unbound protomers of the dimer. Our structural analyses indicated that both the antigen-antibody interaction and the dimerization contribute to the overall structure of the protein complex. In particular, the segment interaction network analysis (ProD) of the antigen-antibody complex revealed the existence of an extensive interaction network that involves the protomers, the bound antigen and the solvent. This evidence suggests that the protein complex is stabilized by both the potential of the protomers to bind the antigen and the interaction between the protomers. While the presence of a large network of interaction between the protein protomers and between the protomers and the solvent can be explained with the stabilization due to the antigen-antibody interaction,

Description of the Related Art There is an increasing demand for a video camera for which a picture can be taken not only at slow speeds but also at fast speeds, and which is easy to use. U.S. Patent Application Publication No. 2001/0024453 A1 discloses a video camera which is easy to use. In U.S. Patent Application Publication No. 2001/0024453 A1, even when photographing at a slow speed, a shutter speed as high as possible is set on a sensor used in a video camera of a type in which, even when a picture is taken at a slow speed, a high-luminance light quantity is measured during exposure.
