In a step towards helping to overcome their drawbacks, Tesla has developed a new power plant system. The company has just announced the UNUSED, a stationary energy storage and networking solution. UNUSED is based on Tesla's power plant system, Powerpack, and aims to provide clean, renewable energy. It can be deployed in one of three ways, including as a standalone system that is intended to provide peak power, or a large building that can serve multiple functions including apartments, offices and retail. It is also able to provide power to a network of connected residences and businesses. It is an instant electricity system that is able to provide large amounts of clean power very quickly. It is able to maintain and constantly maintain the voltage level of the electricity grid. The technology can be used as an alternative to traditional grid-tied systems and, when deployed in a larger grid, Tesla's mobile Powerpack units can be used to control more traditional power plants. By using a storage unit to increase the amount of renewable energy that can be fed to the grid, it enables the distribution of power to a wider range of consumers. UNUSED uses lithium ion batteries to store power. It also incorporates two inverters. If the batteries are not needed for energy storage, the electricity produced can be directed to the grid immediately. UNUSED's lithium ion batteries can be recharged at a rate of at least 40 miles per hour. In order to help with the storage of energy, Tesla has added a cold-plate cooling system to the batteries. This produces a constant temperature which is ideal for maintaining the health of the batteries. It was also specified to consume very little power so that no additional power requirements are necessary to cool the batteries. The batteries are also expected to last between seven to ten years. Unused is another product by Tesla that would be useful in e79caf774b
