V-flex enables multiple users to record and playback keystrokes on a single computer, without having to use multiple systems. The invention provides an interface between physical computers and the V-flex recording and playback systems. The V-flex recording and playback systems have the capacity to read and save keystrokes that are issued to the physical computer from any application on any computer in the network. In order to record a keystroke in V-flex, a user merely presses the key that he wants to record, and presses the special key on the keyboard to send the keystrokes to V-flex. The V-flex system then displays a blinking cursor at the current position of the keyboard cursor on the screen. The user then proceeds to record the keystrokes, by typing, pressing the space bar, etc. Upon completion, the user presses the special key again, and the keystrokes are sent back to the physical computer that generated them. The V-flex system automatically saves and displays the keystrokes that were generated. Once the V-flex system records keystrokes from a physical computer, it can easily be replicated to other physical computers in the network. With the help of V-flex's optional software, the user can also record and playback the keystrokes on any Windows application. In the replay mode, the user simply enters the recorded keystrokes into the Windows application, and V-flex replays the keystrokes for the user. By means of the optional recording and replay software, the invention can be used to record and playback keystrokes from any application on any computer in the network.
