Alphomega elliott waves for metastock 11 .Q: C++ constant reference object Can you tell me in which situations this is necessary? I heard that it is a common practice in many object-oriented languages for putting references in constant objects. For example, in C++ class MyClass { // some attributes and methods } ... const MyClass& MY_CONSTANT = someObject; I know that in some cases I can use a static method instead of a constant reference, but I don't know why it is necessary to introduce a constant reference to some class object. A: There are several reasons, but one of the most common is to allow for compile-time access to the object. This is more convenient than having to use an accessor function. For example, there might be a reason that the class could add functionality to the object dynamically. Or your function might depend on another object/function and you'd want to make sure that you have a run-time reference to it. The other common case is templates, where it's useful to have a compile-time template argument. A: Not really. It is sometimes used for the same reason you use the static keyword instead of the const keyword. //probably not very useful class MyClass { private: int *stuff; public: static int const& (cdecl *
