One thing to bear in mind if you have a Fujifilm X-T1: if you are using X-Trans sensor RAW files with Lightroom 5.2, you are going to seriously regret upgrading to Lightroom 5.3 if you are working with 5D3 photos that still use the X-Trans 2.0 RAW files. Don't do it. Once you upgrade your X-T1 to LR 5.3, you no longer have access to X-Trans RAW files. This is one of several reasons why I think the best way to create JPEGs from X-Trans RAW files is still to do so with UFRaw 2.0 (which is why I still shoot Jpegs and only convert to DNG if I want to create a JPEG from an X-Trans RAW file). The new image development feature contained in Lightroom 6 (and the Digital Photography Masterclass course) is a great way to enhance the clarity of an image - and even get rid of that annoying painted-on film effect. My only reservation about the feature is that it doesn't seem to be able to handle well the effect used on most negative films. With film, the painted-on effect often appears as the gradations on the negative are very steep and don't let light in between the shadows and highlights, so it still looks like a painted-on effect. The solution offered by the new feature is to smooth out those gradations and let more light through - which is fine for removing painted-on film effects. HOWEVER, the "Pixel Intensifier" that is used for this purpose also intensifies all areas of the image - such that if you have very dark and very bright areas in an image, then the 'quick fix' is to increase the bright areas, which then creates even brighter areas!
