The fabrication processes are well known for forming ceramic honeycomb structures or porous walls, often called ceramic fiber filters. Basically, such honeycomb structures have a large number of small passages or cells in communication with one another through which filtrate is passed to remove particulate matter from fluid such as an air stream. Typically, the honeycomb structures and the cells have a large number of parallel passages running generally lengthwise along the honeycomb walls. The honeycomb construction generally gives the filter as a whole a relatively high surface area to volume ratio. The ceramic, which can be of a refractory material such as cordierite, expands when heated. As the honeycomb structure expands the cells become larger and the ratio of the passage diameters to one another varies. This can be in the direction transverse to the length of the passages. The cells are normally formed by extruding the ceramic such as cordierite through holes formed in a permeable plate, and then firing the ceramic. The honeycomb structures can be formed by sequentially extruding the ceramic through holes in a series
